And from my con - trite heart, with tears, two won - ders I con - fess:

A Meditation on the Cross

By Martin Luther

Preached on Good Friday, 1534

Now as our dear Lord Jesus Christ is lifted into the air to hang on the cross, suspended between heaven and earth, with nothing any longer on earth to call his own, he is exercising his true, real, priestly office, accomplishing the work he came on earth to do, not only with his suffering, by offering up himself, but also by his intercessions. For both constitute a priest's work, to sacrifice and to intercede.

But when he offers himself thus for us, what garment or priestly garb does this priest, Jesus Christ, wear and what is his altar? His adornment is not a gold or silk cloak, decked with pearls or jewels, like the pope's bishops adorn themselves, nor like the Old Testament high priest who had his special priestly resplendent robes. Instead he hangs on the cross bare and naked, covered with wounds, and has, so to speak, not a thread on his body. Instead of a purple robe he is red with blood, his body covered with wounds and welts, badly swollen. Instead of a priestly headdress he wears a bloodied crown of thorns. That the adornment of this High Priest.

This High Priest is both priest and offering; for he offers up his body and life on the cross. ... Yet, he is the true Priest and Bishop, who in great love offers up himself and lets his own body be consumed for the redemption of the whole world.
